

Rhinology starts collaboration with Wiley

Rhinology has been produced for over 60 years in-house but with the increasing complexities of publishing scientific journals we felt it was the right moment to form an external partnership and after a rigorous search, and in close collaboration with the editorial board, choose Wiley, whose expertise in the field and modus operandi are the most compatible with Rhinology.

We are therefore delighted to announce the beginning of an exciting new chapter in the history of our journal. Wiley, as many of you will know, has 200 years of experience in publishing, particularly in the fields of science and medicine. With a legacy built on trust, they will partner with us in shaping a world driven by information, curiosity, and continuous advancement in rhinology.

Since the first publication of the journal in 1964, Rhinology has been dedicated to providing a trusted platform for the dissemination of rigorous, innovative, and impactful research. The continued support of our editorial board members, reviewers, authors and readers has enabled us to grow in both quality and reputation. We are very proud to be in the top 3 ORL journals, based on impact factor, during the last years.

The partnership with Wiley brings together the journal's strong academic foundation with the publisher's expertise in modern publishing technologies, global dissemination, and editorial support. This synergy will allow us to improve manuscript processing, enhance digital accessibility, and ensure that published articles reach a broader international audience. We believe these improvements will increase the visibility and impact of the valuable work published in our journal.

The collaboration between Rhinology and Wiley also opens up new opportunities for growth. We look forward to expanding our international reach, attracting a more diverse range of submissions, fostering interdisciplinary dialogue, promoting greater engagement within the global research community and making Rhinology better accessible for non ERS members. While the publishing partnership is new, our mission remains unchanged. We will continue to uphold the highest standards of editorial integrity, rigorous peer review, ethical publishing practices, and scientific excellence. The editorial independence of the journal remains central to our identity, the same editors will handle your submissions and every decision will continue to be guided by the principles of fairness, transparency, and academic quality. Also the strong and friendly relationship with the European Rhinologic Society (ERS) will not change and we will continue to offer Rhinology as an integral part of the ERS membership benefits.

We also recognize that transitions can bring questions and adjustments for authors, reviewers, and readers. We plan to move to the new manuscript handling system this autumn. Together with Wiley, we are committed to making this transition as smooth as possible.

As we embark on this journey with Wiley, we invite you all to join us in shaping the future of the journal. We are excited about the opportunities ahead and look forward to building an even stronger, more impactful journal for the years to come.

On behalf of the whole editorial team

Wytse J. Fokkens
Editor in Chief
Amsterdam, the Netherlands